

“Going Corporate is 100% on the money. The hysterical analysis reminded me of all the reasons I bolted from Corporate America after just one year.”

– Sam Solovey, contestant of NBC’s hit reality show, “The Apprentice”

SPEAKING TOPICS

- Why the company wants you to drink coffee.
- The politics of bag lunches versus buying lunch.
- Eating at your desk.
- The IT department.
- Being "yourself."

TRUMP ENEMIES 1 AND 2

Writers in Los Angeles and New York respectively, Embree and Shapiro were two brash twenty somethings when they set out to write their book and on corporate working lives and livelihoods to recent college grads. As twenty somethings still, they are a long way from being done in their quest as corporate intelligence.

“The fast, slick read is tears-streaming-down-the-face funny and the advice is dead-on.”

- USA TODAY

SCREWING UP?

Entertaining and educational all at the same time, Embree and Shapiro have comically written about all their mistakes so a new corporate employee doesn't have to make them too. One important lesson: If your desk is completely empty, clean and tidy, that means you don't have enough work to do. It says 'anal' and 'too much free time.'... You want people to notice your desk has tons of stuff on it.

The clash of the discourse between “newbie” and corporate insider is easily debunked after a hilarious session with Embree and Shapiro. While Human Resource departments might object to some of the cynicism, the authors offer a hilarious and accurate account of life after graduation. Funny yet helpful, GOING CORPORATE: Moving Up Without Screwing UP! will make you laugh out loud while at the same time teach all-important lessons about transitioning to the 9-5 world.